S. and to other creditor nations, in order to preserve her own credit. This is a wise policy, because, by allowing payment by her debtors to be delayed, a much larger sum will ultimately be received. Britain has also to carry the burden of financing several of the young nations created at the Peace Conference, and she is carrying the weight of Mesopotamia and Palestine. All this puts a tremendous strain on her resources. Payments Already Made: Sources of Revenue.--Great progress has been made in repaying British foreign indebtedness by revenue raised from heavy taxation of luxuries, amusements, trading profits, and the incomes of individuals. Production has also been largely increased and the adoption of automatic machinery and new processes, joined to the specialised training of workmen, have added to the productive power of her industries...
