But there are two points upon which I do hope I may have succeeded in convincing you; if not, I shall be bitterly disappointed. The one is, that a satisfactory answer to this question of tonality or change of key is the necessary preliminary to any further investigation of the many intricate and interesting problems which music presents to us. The other is that the only method by which these and kindred questions can be satisfactorily treated is the empiric method. Music, as Helmholtz himself says, is a problem which by its very nature belongs to the domain of aesthetics. It is...
